This technology was developed with the help of professional sports teams and combines real-time play, motion capture, and 3D animation to put players in dynamic scenarios.

Throughout the life cycle of the data, it has also been curated alongside FIFA data experts, who have added contextual information to give the data a greater purpose.

This is used to address a number of the changes to gameplay that occurred over the last few years, along with a new iteration of the attacking tactics AI for players and the full suite of new tactical options. This includes a full overhaul of the way captains coach tactics and the ability to adapt behaviours to player differences like strengths, weaknesses, fitness levels, and form. This is all possible through a range of additional contextual data - contextual information about the player such as positioning, proximity to team-mates, and team success - with the added input of the HyperMotion technology. HyperMotion technology has been the first step towards a wider vision.

Other elements of the game that will be driven by additional data across all areas of gameplay are: Change and control AI match fit Player diversification Physicality Playmaker responsivity Team performance Technical coaching “We’ve spent much time developing this technology to make sure it can drive a range of changes and improvements to the user experience. FIFA, so that in the long term, we can extend the player-to-user and player-to-strategy connections. A lot of the things we have been introducing over the last few years, like goal kicks, for example, were made to bring a new concept into the game. We can use the data from HyperMotion to introduce those concepts into FIFA over a longer period of time,” said Matt Prior, Lead Match Developer on FIFA 22. HyperMotion was conceived by EA Sports in conjunction with technology partners E-Prime and Atletico Madrid. This year, Atletico has joined EA SPORTS as a strategic partner to create new innovative content and solutions for FIFA. As a result of that partnership, the A.S. Roma Football Club - the richest Italian club and winner of the 50th UEFA Champions League - is the official partner of the UEFA Champions League. “This is an important time for our club as we celebrate our 50th anniversary. It is also a great moment to expand our partnership with EA SPORTS,
