Hard West is a third-person action-adventure sandbox game set in a forgotten western town called Valdez. You awake in the middle of a bitter cold night with no memory of who you are. The place you woke up in looks as if there has been a disaster. The temperature outside is below -50 C (-58 F). There are a lot of decaying dead bodies lying around and something sinister is always waiting for you in the next corner. As you walk around the town searching for clues you will learn that you are the only survivor of some kind of murder mystery. You begin to unearth your past and pieces of your story. Along the way you will meet and form friendships with other survivors, gather resources and sell them at your makeshift shop. You'll also fight off the many foes that stand in your way. The good news is there are many unlocked weapons to be found around the town and they all have their own unique features. The bad news is they all are highly lethal. Album review by Drummercy World In January, commercial video game audio services startup CallidusCloud explained how their service uses “machine learning” to provide more accurate data for creating music in VR/AR games. They called this algorithm, called VR Passion, “the next big leap in audio”. That same month we asked if they would be making music for Warhammer 40,000: Gladius, and their response was that they’re looking into it. CallidusCloud is a major competitor of the other big VR/AR audio service AudioJockey, who also have the rights to the music in Alien: Isolation, the critically acclaimed PSVR game from Creative Assembly. They also have an extensive background in music tech such as Dolby Atmos. That’s backed up by how their VR Passion algorithm works, with references to generative music engines and real-time wave-table synthesis. In a story about CallidusCloud published earlier in 2018, it explained that its audio creators used the VR Passion algorithm to help with making the Gladius campaign soundtrack. Gladius is the long term collaborative project from Games Workshop, the tabletop game company best known for the Warhammer 40,000 universe. The Warhammer franchise has a large number of spin-offs, from miniatures to board games, the best known being the Euehromium series. CallidusCloud is the first to discuss their work on Gladius online, and claims to be the first fully OST-powered VR game. It’s rather vague, but, no disrespect, it’s what happens when you ask CallidusCloud, and the studio’s PR and marketing are in the same office. CallidusCloud are clearly creating music for VR games and aren’t afraid to hype it up. The official debut of the Gladius soundtrack at GamesCom was intended to be a show of CallidusCloud’s technology, but the company is clearly not shy about the promised of a soundtrack that isn’t already OST dominated. The website for the soundtrack leads to a learning demo. With the demo, you get a demo of the VR Passion algorithm on a Rock Band style drum kit. You choose a pattern and the rhythm is added, allowing you to create your own drumming as the gameplay is supported and used in a number of shared spaces on the website. There’s no doubt this is a
