

Windows Millennium Edition (internally Windows 4.90) was the last in the DOS-based Windows product line. Like Windows 95 and Windows 98, it used the same .exe application called "Windows". To support some of the features of this .exe application, the user needed to have administrator rights. Some users complained that they could not work properly with applications in this mode. Moreover, it was noticed that over time, some applications that used this feature might not work correctly. Some
