I found the following lines in the apache log file, Microsoft (R) Windows (R) Operating System [14] at "C:\Users\guru\Downloads\maisanta.exe Does anyone have an idea about this? Please help. A: Based on my knowledge this may happen in situations where You are using .Net Framework 4.5 and above. You are trying to download a download manager like 7-zip or WinRAR. You may find the issue by increasing your Application Pool recycle and your web browser cache size to a considerable amount. What you can do to solve the issue: Increase your Application Pool recycle and your web browser cache size to a considerable amount. Try to download the software from another computer. Make sure that the software is not corrupted. Make sure that you are not running any other software which is accessing the internet like Media Player, Spotify or any other. Sometimes the issue is caused by having multiple concurrent users on your system. Q: Objective-C: retrieve value from a string before a string is sent to a c function I have three strings: NSString *m1 = [NSString stringWithFormat:@"%f",0.0]; NSString *m2 = [NSString stringWithFormat:@"%f",0.1]; NSString *m3 = [NSString stringWithFormat:@"%f",0.9]; I am writing them to a c function. The function takes as many arguments as needed. So my question is: how can I retrieve the values m1,m2,m3 before the c function is launched? A: You can't "retrieve" the values before they're passed to the C function, because they're not there. So, no, there's no way to do this unless you already have the values in C, and that's clearly a bad thing. What you can do is save the values into variables in your Objective-C code, then use an instance of NSInvocation to call the C function. NSString *m1 = [NSString stringWithFormat:@"%f",0.0]; NSString *m2 = [NSString stringWithFormat:@"%f",0.1]; NSString *m3 = [NSString stringWithFormat:@"%f",0.9];
